While the Navaho skills have been expressed chiefly through weaving and silversmithing, they have also produced baskets + some pottery. Neither of these can compare with superior quality of the Arizona + California basket makers, nor the great Pueblo potters, still, they did make them for their own use. These crafts are nearly gone among the Navaho. The pottery, used for small storage jars + for drums with skin tied over the top, are not truly fired as the Pueblo people do; rather they are baked beside an open fire.
