Dear Mr. Porter:

I have written a book about our deteriorating environment and specifically protesting the use of overhead transmission lines through scenic areas. This book will be published by Oxford University Press next winter. I am now in the process of assembling a few illustrations that will help make the issue more vivid.

I would especially like to use one of your photographs, a winter landscape that appeared in In Wilderness is the Preservation of the World opposite January 24, 1856.

Unfortunately we will not be able to use color in our illustrations but this photograph is so nearly black and white that I believe it would still be lovely in a black and white print.

I hope you will be willing to give us permission to use it. Of course, I would expect to pay a permission fee for the rights.

Yours truly,

Louise B. Young
