

W H C

Sire:

Mine limbs are feeble with the weight and draught of this scholastic persuance. But persuance from what locale you may ask? Be it that you are observant, methinks, yourself already advised whereby the postmark appears on the outer cover of this humble compendium of my academic endeavors after that great abyss of learning; which ~~breeds~~ habitus of the intellect - Tulane. To wit, I now entertain such great thoughts as I may have at the university to the North in the hamlet of Denton.

A great fall you think? Not so! I do flit with opinions of the superiority of this locale over the cloistering effect of said Dulane. The vicarulum ~~teeth~~ ~~is~~ ~~indeed~~ far superior for one who shall ensue the practice of ~~staying~~ that gross aperture of the human visage.

(For sooth, there be those, who, considering themselves in, would substitute the term "dentist").

But, alas, enough said. I inquire about yourself. I should hope that you are waxing content and successful in the study of baristry. I wish you the best of fortune in your forthcoming examinations and but leave you with this awe inspiring notation. For sooth, doeth a sage study redundancy?

Knitely,

John C. C. ex.
