

Dear Stuart,

4/14/02

Raleigh and I wanted to thank you again for the wonderful afternoon you spent with us. The stories and personal touches you supplied in connection with your work will enable us a special understanding as we view your work in the future.

We also had a nice visit to ICU the next day. Again, thank for the time you spent with us. And I was just kidding about the Wall Mart comment and your brochure. Ha, Ha!

Former Prime Minister of Pakistan

The logo for Texas Christian University (TCU) is displayed in a large, stylized, outlined font. The letters are bold and blocky, with a double outline effect.

The daughter of Pakistan's first elected leader, Benazir Bhutto was educated at Harvard's Radcliffe College and Oxford University. Completing her education, Ms. Bhutto returned to Pakistan to play a leading role in its history. As leader of the Pakistan People's Party from 1977 to 1988, Ms. Bhutto waged a struggle for democracy and human rights in Pakistan. During that time, she was imprisoned and exiled. From exile, she guided the resistance to the military regime in Pakistan. Returning from exile in 1988, she was elected prime minister at age 35, becoming the youngest chief executive in the world and the first woman prime minister in the Muslim world. Declaring that "democracy was the best revenge," she guided her nation to a democratic system, restoring constitutional freedoms, guaranteeing freedom to the press and reallocating resources to the country's social sector. After 20 months in office, her government was unconstitutionally dismissed. She led the opposition in the National Assembly for three years, until she was re-elected in 1993. During the three years of her second term as prime minister, her government built over 24,000 schools, electrified most villages in the country and embarked on an unprecedented initiative in power generation and power distribution. She also privatized and deregulated most of the major industries in the country and institutionalized macroeconomic reform. Ms. Bhutto's government was dismissed one year ago, two years before the constitutional end of her term. She again serves as the leader of the Pakistan People's Party in opposition in the National Assembly. Ms. Bhutto and her husband have one son and two daughters. She has authored two books, Foreign Policy in Perspective and Daughter of Destiny: An Autobiography.
