Dear Stuart:

Your letter saddens me. I am sorry you did not raise your concerns earlier. I am prepared to accept responsibility for our failure to meet your expectations in terms of dealing with the work of you and your brother, but I am puzzled by your distrust and animosity. Your rush to judgment reminds me of a letter that I received in the early days of my Kimbell tenure which was equally harsh, if not presumptuous. I am proud that we allotted to you and Scott our very best galleries during the busy holiday season, but I have no illusions about our relationship thereafter. Nothing would give me greater satisfaction than the prospect of you and Scott finding your fair share of fame and fortune with or without our participation.

Faithfully yours,

Edmund P. Pillsbury, Ph.D.
C.E.O.

P.S. I thought the enclosed article would be of interest even though its conclusions are somewhat different from those expressed in your letter.

A successful career move

Kimball director actually leaps to the world of commerce

By the time he was 30, Kimball had already made a name for himself in the world of commerce. He had been a successful businessman for many years, and his reputation was well known in the industry. He had a strong sense of direction and a clear vision of the future. He was a man of action, and he was not afraid to take risks. He was a man who knew what he wanted, and he was willing to go to any lengths to get it. He was a man who was always looking for new opportunities, and he was always ready to seize them. He was a man who was always moving forward, and he was always looking for the next step. He was a man who was always taking control of his own destiny, and he was always looking for the way to success.

Kimball's success in the world of commerce was not just a result of his own efforts, but also of the support of his family and friends. They were always there for him, and they were always helping him to achieve his goals. They were always encouraging him, and they were always believing in him. They were always standing by him, and they were always supporting him. They were always there for him, and they were always helping him to achieve his goals. They were always encouraging him, and they were always believing in him. They were always standing by him, and they were always supporting him.
