Dear Catriona:

The Gods were against us yesterday. I would not have stood you up for anything. There were a number of things I needed to discuss with you which would have been best done conversationally. When I talked to you on the phone last thursday, I told you that, since I was only five minutes away from my office - and you didn't know exactly when you might be finished with your other business - that you should call me at home as soon as you were ready to head out from downtown and I would meet you at the office. I waited for your call at home till about 10 minutes after 4 o'clock when Dennis Gabbert called me and told me he had just talked to you. As soon as I hung up the phone, I assumed that your previous meeting with the Basses was concluded, I got in my car and headed to the studio, telling Scott to call me there if he heard from you.

I was at the studio - office at about 4:15 pm, and I waited there until 5:30. I was due at that time at the Modern Art Museum, but before I left I went out to the front porch and discovered your letter! Since I came from the back way to the studio, I have the uncomfortable feeling that I may have been waiting for you in my office and you may have been waiting for me outside in your car! I'm sorry we missed each other.

Early next week I will fax to you some of the questions I wanted to ask you on your visit here. I am really very sorry that we could not get together. I hope you are feeling better, by the way, and if there is anything I can do to help, please do not hesitate to give me a call. Until we get together, I remain, madam, your humble servant.
