

a pen of poles and rock erected around the grave. On either side the body was deposited in a sitting posture or on its side, facing the rising sun and the grave was covered with rocks, sticks, and dirt, apparently with no special system or arrangement. The ideal burial place of a medicine man was high on the south side of a hill or slope - if possible at the spot where he had received power.

When an old person died, or one whose services were no longer useful, there was little mourning and that for only a short time.

* The women talk as they prepare the body. They talk of how he changed single woundedly into the grace of the young & tender. The feathers in his hair clipped off by bullets.
